Chapter 1

On the Look Out

In those times of ours, though concerning the exact year there is no need to be precise, a boat of dirty and demoralized appearance, with two figures in it, found on the Thames, between Southwark bridge which is of iron, and London Bridge which is of stone, as an autumn evening was closing in.

The figures in this boat were close of a strong man with rugged grizzled hair and a sun-browned face, and a dark girl of seventeen or twenty, sufficiently like him to be recognizable as his daughter.

The girl reused, pulling a pair of ocullis over easily; the man, with the sudden-borne slack in his hands, and his hands loose in his whalebone, kept an eager look out. He had no net, hook, or line, and he could not be a fisherman; his boat had no cushion for a sitter; no paint, no inscription, no appliance beyond a rusty bateaux and a coil of rope, and he could set it by a waterman; his boat was too crazy and too soon to take service for delivery, and he could not be a lighterman or river-carrier; there was no due to what he looked for, but he looked for something, with a more intent and searching gaze. The tide, which had turned an hour before, were running down, and his eyes watched every little race and eddy in its broad sweep, as the boat made slight head-way against it, as drove stern foremost before it, according as he directed his daughter by a movement of his head. She watched his face as nearly as he was the river. But, in the intensity of her look then was a touch of dread or horror.

Allied to the bottom of the river rather than the surface, by reasons of its stones and rent with which it was covered, and its sudden stumps, the boat and the two forms in it obviously were doing something that they often did, and were seeking what they often sought. Half savage as the man showed, with no covering on his naked head, with his brown arms bare to bewitch the elbow and the shoulders, with the loose knot of a lesser keel, lying low on his bare breast in a wilderness of beard and whisker, with such force as he were seeming to be made out of the mud that begirded his boat, still there was a business-like usage in his steady pace; he with every fibre active of the girl, with every turn of her wrist, perhaps most of all with her look of dread or horror; they were things of usage.

‘Keep her set, Lizie. Tid runs strong here. Keep her well afore the sweep of it.’

‘Trusting is the girl’s skill and making no use of the reader, he eyed the coming tide with an absorbed attention. So the girl eyed him. But, it happened now, that a slant of light from the setting sun glanced into the bosom of the boat, and, reaching a waterman near which bore some resemblance to the outline of a moulded human form, coloured it as though with dull red blood. This caught the girl’s eye, and she shivered.

‘What ails you?’ said the man, immediately aware of it, though no intent on the advancing wave, it was nothing either.’
